Cedrus (common English name cedar) is a genus of coniferous trees in the plant family Pinaceae (subfamily Abietoideae). They are native to the mountains of the Western Himalayas and the Mediterranean region, occurring at altitudes of 1,567–3,234m in the Himalayas and 1,234–2,278m in the Mediterranean. Cedrus trees can grow up to 30–40 m (occasionally 60m) tall with spicy-resinous scented wood, thick ridged or square-cracked bark, and broad, level branches. The shoots are dimorphic with long shoots, which form the framework of the branches, and short shoots, which carry most of the leaves. The leaves are evergreen and needle-like, 8–60 mm long, arranged in an open spiral phyllotaxis on long shoots, and in dense spiral clusters of 15–45 together on short shoots; they vary from bright grass-green to dark green to strongly glaucous pale blue-green, depending on the thickness of the white wax layer which protects the leaves from desiccation. The seed cones are barrel-shaped, 6–12 cm long and 3–8 cm broad, green maturing gray. And, as in Abies, disintegrate at maturity to release the winged seeds. The seeds are 10–15 mm long, with a 20–30 mm wing; as in Abies, the seeds have two or three resin blisters, each containing an unpleasant-tasting resin, thought to be a defense against squirrel predation. Cone maturation takes one year, with pollination in autumn and the seeds maturing the same time a year la

About Cedar

Cedar evokes a hand-carved sculptural aesthetic by wrapping rudimentary vector shapes around calligraphic structures. The seemingly-straightforward letterforms reveal a paradox on closer observation: their tactile appearance emerges from a distinctly digital construction of dissonant arcs and corners.
